PAGAN AND THE CHRISTIAN

Japan Has No Religious System While Russia Is Made Up Of One, Practically Speaking.

Russian loyalty flows out of Christian devotion; that of Japan out of race sympathy and unity. These sources of loyalty are so utterly unlike that the Russian source has no existence at all in Japan; and the political history of Russia has made loyalty of race impossible. She has no race sympathy or unity.

It may be that the world will never see again, on a grand scale, the heroism which can be kindled by loyalty to race. Even in Great Britain and Ireland races are so mixed, and there are such differences of speech and of ideals in politics and religion, that wide and deep race sympathy is impossible. We have to substitute loyalty to a flag. That flag does, it is true, represent to us the devotion and courage of our kinsmen. But on every well fought field Irishmen have borne that flag in the front of the battle, and yet they declare that it is not their flag. Side by side also with the British ensign in the Low Countries, in the peninsula, and in the Crimea, where our soldiers have won renown, there have been the flags of other countries in alliance with us.

The little island power in the Pacific presents the intensely interesting spectacle of a single ancient race, arming itself with weapons invented and forged by other and alien people, and advancing with one great shout of defiance, uttered in a tongue unknown to the rest of the world, and bearing down before it the greatest military power which the Christian world has known. It will be safe to say that such a sight the world will never see again.

Properly speaking, Japan has no religious system. Russia is all religious system. But Japan has, as has been well said, the soul of a nation, and Russia has not. Indeed, we may ask, where else on the earth can we look for the soul of a nation?

The present war has given us a vast and most impressive picture and has given it in a pagan community. Whatever measure of success may yet attend the Russian arms, there must still be the recollection of her frightful losses and defeats during this war. A pagan nation defeats her, notwithstanding all her real piety and her imposing religious standing.

"BISMARCK" AN IDEAL DOG.

He Was a Fine Dane Who Made Friends of Every One—Died Aiding Master.

The dignified Great Dane was named "Bismarck" for he was a great grandson of Tyra, who lost his life while dragging furniture from the burning palace of his master, the great German chancellor, writes A. W. Dimock, in St. Nicholas. Bismarck had not the fierce look usual with Great Danes; because his ears were as nature made them and had not been trimmed in the cruel fashion of the day. Sometimes puppies presumed on his gentleness and teased him without harm, but if a dog of size became troublesome a big paw was laid upon that dog and he was crushed to the earth.

Bismarck once adopted a little spaniel with a big name and was bullied by him without limit. "Kaiser Wilhelm" was a restless puppy who got into disputes with strange dogs, and then Bismarck stood between Kaiser and trouble; and Kaiser, being only a dog, repaid him with gratitude and danced around him in token of affection. Together they caught woodchucks and chased minks, squirrels, foxes and an occasional bear. Once they caught a porcupine, and Bismarck came home with a full growth of porcupine quill whiskers.

Bismarck's chosen friend was the bicycle girl, whom he rarely allowed to pass the gate without him. As she rode through woods and over lonely roads he was always beside her wheel, and was ever ready for a romp with his friend. He would jump around her in a fashion so lively that a stranger usually sought safety by climbing the nearest fence.

At night, from the hearth, Bismarck's eyes would turn with kindly gleam from one to another of those he was guarding.

A melancholy interest is added to the story by the fact that about a year ago Bismarck perished in the flames which destroyed his master's house, as did his ancestor Tyra.
